To be announced in Charlestown:

1. An invitation is extended to all parents with children who have not yet been baptised to attend a very important meeting with the Elders right after service today.
2. Our church was born amid a fiery, Holy Spirit—inspired conviction that Christ was coming soon; our church will end amid a similar, Spirit-inspired conviction, even more feverish than the one in which it was born. Until then, we struggle with the limpid, Laodicean lukewarmness

(Rev. 3:14-19) that has separated these two prophetic perimeters by 150 years (and counting). Adventism began with a certainty that God had raised this people to proclaim the last warning message to the world, a message of the "everlasting gospel" in the context of the three angels of Revelation 14. Yet as these years have passed, new generations have arisen far removed from the excitement, passion, and commitment that burned within the souls of their forebears, those who dedicated their lives in the belief that God had given this church a unique message for a dying world. Today some among us even assert not only that we are not that different from other churches, but that we shouldn't be. Sadly, there's a certain logic to that thinking. After all, if we don't have something unique, something better to offer everyone else, why not be like everyone else? Despite those voices, many among us still believe—and rightly so—that God raised up the Seventh-day Adventist Church not because He wanted just another denomination but because He has given us something different, something better, to proclaim to the world. If He hadn't, what justification do we have for our existence? It's hard to find one. And what He has given us are crucial, distinctive truths that make us Seventh-day Adventists. Not Lutherans, not Episcopalians, not Baptists, not Methodists, but Adventists, Seventh-day Adventists. Our prayer and Bible study for this and next quarter will be focused on the pillars of our faith. Each member is especially invited to Wednesday night service as we study what God has given us to proclaim, as we help each other to grow and develop spiritually as we study together.

To be announced in Beulah:
